Murdoch Security Group Expands Operations to Mexico

Clients to benefit from increased protection in increasingly hostile environment

April 14, 2009 – Murdoch Security Group today announced plans to expand operations into Mexico and expects to open its Mexico City office by the end of this month.

According to William Vassell, chairman and CEO of Murdoch, “We are currently in partnership negotiations with the country’s best and highest-quality security firms to potentially join our owner-operator business model.”

Murdoch is providing the financial backing to support the venture and seeking investment partners in New York to ensure clients with business operations in Mexico will have full-service, high-quality protection for their companies and employees.

“The escalating violence, instability and narco-terrorism have created serious threats to the large Fortune 500 companies in Mexico,” Vassell said. “We are expanding into the country to respond to the call for help.”

Murdoch’s owner-operated model is especially beneficial to Mexican security firms, where financial resources to enhance and expand security services are difficult to obtain.

“Our Mexican partnership firms will be of the highest caliber and, like other members of the Murdoch network, will provide clients with uniformed security, executive protection and bodyguard work.”
